YOUNG MEN AND POLITICS.

A contemporary has asked why the young men of this country do not take an interest in politics. Without attempting to gauge the amount of interest actually taken in politics by the young men—for it can hardly be claimed that the lack of interest is altogether universal—there are several reasons to account for whatever of indifference there is to public affairs. Some of these reasons are tangible, others are more or less intangible. Many of the young men are of foreign birth or parentage, and some of these have not decided to make these Islands their home. They take more interest in the politics of the nation from which they come than in those of this country. In a proportion of cases, doubtless, they feel that they have no right to interfere with the making or administering of the laws. Even if any of the laws bear hardly upon their personal interests, they may consider that there are conditions of life here which more than offset the onerous requirements of the state. Then, having taken but small interest in affairs when everything had been working with comparative smoothness, they are incapable of judging of causes when serious political disputes or difficulties arise, and therefore either choose to form or express no opinion, or to decide summarily according to superficial evidence that has recently transpired. As a rule the laws of this Kingdom are modelled after those of enlightened nations, and when moderately well administered, cannot be accounted burdensome. Therefore, when times are prosperous, people of alien sympathies, who are doing well in their private affairs, take no thought for the concerns of state, and thus become used to doing without politics, and rather flatter themselves in not being bored with them. It is only when dull times come, and it has been found that the Government has, like everybody else, been going too fast, and depression in trade is accompanied and augmented by embarrassment of national finances, that such people begin to see that the politics of the country have a real interest to them.

On the other hand, no matter what interest there may be in Hawaiian politics for resident young men, it must be difficult for them to find an opening for taking an active part in public affairs. No standard, emblazoned with any distinct set of principles, is uplifted for them to rally round. In the Legislature politics have been chiefly a series of skirmishes between the "ins" and the "outs" over isolated matters of administration. The Government party was more like a beleaguered garrison, holding the fort for dear life, than the army it should have been, on the march conquering and to conquer the many obstacles to national progress which exist. The Opposition party was an alliance of hostile hands, without very definite purposes or united aims. They hit at a head wherever it appeared above the battlements of the citadel, and made a few attempts to carry the stronghold by storm. Their ultimate object was doubtless to institute a better order of things than that which obtained, but they only appealed to the public mind and to the sovereign against the sins of omission and commission of the Ministry. They may or may not have made out a case that demanded the expulsion of the Ministers. That is not the point under discussion. Where the Opposition failed, amidst some signal triumphs and throughout a general record of effective public service, was in giving the country no explicit assurance that, in the event of the Ministry being overthrown, they had men ready to take their places who would represent particular principles and a definite policy, and whom they would unflinchingly support so long as the people signified acceptance of them. The people must know what and whom they are called upon to support before this country can get the benefit of the modicum of responsible government which is contained in its constitution. It is, therefore, the vagueness of our politics more than anything else which we regard as the greatest obstacle to the young men taking a live interest in them. This point could be amplified, but for the present we are content to quote the words of a correspondent of the paper referred to in the first part of this article:—

"What chance do existing methods afford for the stranger within our gates, or even the average permanent resident, to engage in politics with any satisfaction to himself or advantage to the public? Where is the political party, club or association which he can join? Where are the meetings which he can attend? Where is the machinery through which he can act, and how can he in any way have any voice whatever in the conduct of any party, the formation of any policy, or the selection of any candidates? In short, where are the means and methods by and through which he has been accustomed to work heretofore, and without which, or something like them, it is impossible for him to work to any purpose, either here or elsewhere?"

EDITORIAL NOTES.

In hard times, the difference between good and poor living may often lie between the cultivation and the neglect of the little plot surrounding the workman's cottage.

A full house at the minstrels, and throngs at the whirling, skating rink, and roller coaster—those antidotes to dullness—on a single evening, leave no room for doubt that the times are terribly dull.

The aggravating refusal of the Pacific Mail Company to do carrying services between here and San Francisco should be tested at law. We wonder if the business men of any other port in the world would stand such treatment from any steamers coming to their wharves.

In this issue is a letter condemning the action of the Privy Council in extending liquor licenses to the out districts. Another letter of similar purport is in hand. These expressions, with information from other sources, shows that a strong public opinion condemns the Privy Council.

Several persons have expressed approval of our recent discussions of the land question. It would afford us pleasure to receive communications from those who have given the subject study. Our conviction is that it is destined, in the not remote future, to become one of the foremost questions in this Kingdom.

Some time ago we stated that there was danger in eating canned meats after their exposure a little while to the air. Another thing that should be remembered is that this species of food deteriorates in the cans with age, and the wise provision has been proposed in some places that the date of packing should be stamped upon the tin. Military commissaries have given testimony that canned meats have been extensively used without any harm resulting, and we doubt, if the above points are satisfactorily seen to, that people will lose confidence in this convenient method of putting up food. Of course there should be rigid scrutiny by the authorities of districts where canning is engaged in, from motives both of humanity and of self-interest, to prevent unwholesome food being put up.

EXTENDING THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

EDITOR BULLETIN:—Although admitting that much may be said on both sides, I scarcely think that thoughtful and reasoning men will consider the authorized extension of liquor licenses an advance in the direction of wise progression. If I have correctly read the spirit of modern legislative movements its tendency is towards restriction. In America, Great Britain, Germany, and other countries this is the case. So great a statesman as Gladstone expressed the conviction, not long ago, that England would be compelled to enact measures for the restriction of the liquor traffic. Thus while other nations move in the direction of restriction and prohibition, this little nation seems to think that it rises at a rapid rate by extension and increase. I feel confident that the time will come when this will be seen to have been a sad mistake. I cannot conceive how men who profess to feel a yearning desire to benefit the native race can reconcile the placing of the means of destruction within their reach with those professions. The liquor trade is a curse to any country and any people, but doubly so to all aboriginal races. Can anyone deny this? Name a single instance of any aboriginal race admitting ardent spirits and not being destroyed thereby, either wholly or in part. The greatest enemy that the Hawaiian has to-day is strong drink. It has already done more than any other cause to demoralize and diminish the race, and its work of destruction is still proceeding at a more rapid rate than thoughtless people realize. To talk of increasing the people and at the same time placing in their hands a weapon for self-destruction is all bosh and hypocrisy. Be it understood, I am not a so-called temperance man, and cannot therefore be justly accused of being inspired by the prejudice that is popularly supposed to attach to all advocates of abstinence from intoxicants; but I have seen the effect of ardent spirits on aboriginal races in America, in Africa, in Australasia, and in many islands of Oceania, and have been convinced unwillingly that nothing is so destructive to those races as intoxicants. Any man who has lived a few months among the Hawaiians, and is not wilfully blind, must confess that this enemy is effecting sure and rapid destruction among this people. Why then voluntarily bestow upon such a foe increased liberty, when the dictates of humanity and patriotism cry out for restriction?
